Preface and Acknowledgments

The first Civil Code of the PRC (CCC), adopted by the Chinese national law makers in May 2020, came into force on January 1st, 2021. The Code has 1260 articles and consists of a General Part and six books on property, contracts, personality rights, marriage and family, succession and torts. With the exception of the Book on Personality Rights, all the others are based on existing individual statutes that ceased to apply after the Code became effective. As China does not have a separate Commercial Code, the CCC is equally applicable to commercial transactions. In this sense, the Code is not only of interest for comparative law scholars, but also of great importance for business operation in the country.

Despite the recent increase in publications in English dedicated to the Chinese civil law, an up-to-date comprehensive book covering the entire breadth of the CCC is still missing. Therefore, this book strives to provide foreign readers with a systematic and in-depth analysis of the Code.

The “Chinese Civil Code – The Specific Parts” is intended as a volume to follow the “Chinese Civil Code – The General Part” and covers the six specific books of the Code. In principle, this book is organized in line with the structure of the Code itself. In the CCC, real security and personal security are addressed separately, even though some of the issues are the same. This book consequently designates a separate part for the security law to avoid redundancy and to highlight the significant amendments brought about by the Code and its subsequent judicial interpretation. As contract law makes up nearly a half of the entire Civil Code, this book also puts an emphasis on this area and address six major contract types in detail: the sales contract, lease contract, guaranty contract, mandate contract, factoring contract and technology contract. Due to the limited scope of this book, general property law is mainly dealt with in the context of its major amendments.

In line with the three other books on Chinese law in this series, this one includes a list of laws and regulations, a bibliography and an index at the end. English translations of the norms are mostly from official sources, although some are from Kluwer China and Chinalawinfo. This book attempts to use consistent English translations for Chinese terms and where this is not the case, an indication of alternative translations by different authors is given.

I thank the contributors to this book for sharing their valuable insights in the relevant fields. I am indebted to Johann Wigger, Antonia Becker, Elisabeth Victoria König and Sebastian Krieger of the Institute for East Asian Business Law for taking care of the formatting of the manuscript and compiling the index. Gratitude is also owed to Dr. Tietie Zhang for his assistance in organizing the proofreading, Lucy Eastwood, Wiktoria Gaslawska, Carlos Jackson Almeida for taking on this work, Yang Sijia for editing the legal sources and Mr. Thomas Klich of the Beck Publishing House for his support of this project.

Similarly to in other contexts, the mixed borrowing of foreign law has caused incoherence between the relevant norms (infra at 51 et seqq.).

3. Relationship with the General Part of the Book on Contract

Art. 769 CCC sets out, “For matters not provided in this Chapter, the relevant provisions of Chapter Six (modification and assignment of contracts) of this Book on the assignment of claims shall be applied.” This provision is a natural consequence of the factoring contract being a mixed contract, which always contains the element of assignment of claims (infra at 11). In particular, nonrecourse factoring is actually a special form of the assignment of claim, while recourse factoring is rather close to a loan (infra at 19–21).

The question arising from art. 769 CCC is therefore two-fold. On the one hand, to what extent do the general rules on assignment of claims, such as art. 548 CCC, need modifications to be applied to factoring contracts (infra at 43, 44). A commentary holds that arts. 502 para. 3 and 545–550 CCC are applicable to factoring contracts.<sup>6</sup>

On the other hand, it is questionable whether the provisions in the chapter on factoring contracts can be equally applied to assignment of claims outside of factoring contracts.<sup>7</sup> For example, the assignment of future receivables for factoring purpose is permissible. It is still undecided whether this rule can be extended to cover any claim for any purpose.<sup>8</sup> Also, the provisions governing factoring contracts deviate from the general rules on assignment of claims, particularly regarding the effect of a notice of assignment and a person’s entitlement to notify the assignment (infra at 54, 41). Equally unclear is the question of whether these provisions are only relevant to factoring contracts.<sup>9</sup> The above-mentioned commentary holds that arts. 761, 763–765 and 768 CCC apply mutatis mutandis to assignment of claims.<sup>10</sup>

Although not explicitly mentioned in the CCC, it is necessary to distinguish between a factoring contract and the assignment of a receivable,<sup>11</sup> since the former act serves to create a contractual obligation, which is to be performed by the latter act. Assignment of a receivable constitutes an act of disposition, the effectiveness of which is reliant on the disposal right of the assignor. This separation is particularly essential in determining the validity of multiple factoring contracts (infra at 51 et seqq.).

II. Definition, Types and Major Contents

For the sake of legal certainty, the factoring industry had expressed a wish that the legislator should clarify the legal nature of factoring contracts. However, due to the mixed nature of factoring contracts, the Chinese legislator has opted for a definition that is particularly open in order to accommodate various factoring forms.

1. Definition in Art. 761 CCC

a) Performance of Major Functions. Art. 761 CCC defines a factoring contract as “a contract under which a creditor of accounts receivable transfers the existing or future

accounts receivable to a factor who provides services such as accommodation of funds, management or collection of the accounts receivable, guaranty for the payment of a debtor of the accounts receivable, and the like.” This definition follows the approach adopted by the Factoring Convention and enumerates the four major functions: finance for the supplier, maintenance of accounts relating to the receivables, collection of the receivables and protection against default in payment by debtors. In this chapter, the counterparty of the factor is referred to as the supplier.

- 11 Based on the definition of art. 761 CCC it is clear that the assignment of claims is a mandatory element of a factoring contract. However, other than for its international counterparts, art. 761 CCC does not specify how many functions a contracting party has to perform in order to qualify as a factor. This question is crucial as it constitutes the prerequisite to the application of the provisions governing factoring contracts. One possible solution is to require the performance of just one function, as this maximizes the scope of factoring contracts and may foster the growth of the factoring industry.<sup>12</sup> This construction is supported by previous relevant norms<sup>13</sup> and is endorsed by some commentators.<sup>14</sup>
- 12 A minority view believes that if the factor provides merely one service, he can only choose one of the services: “finance for the supplier” or “protection against default in payment by debtors”. If someone chooses one of the following services: “maintenance of accounts relating to the receivables” and “collection of receivables” without providing one of the other two services, this cannot qualify as a factor. This is because the mere business of debt collection does not satisfy the requirements of a factoring contract, as it does not provide finance to the supplier.<sup>15</sup>
- 13 b) Permissible Scope of the Receivables. Art. 761 CCC is silent regarding the permissible scope of accounts receivable in a factoring contract. By definition, receivables only refer to pecuniary claims arising out of a contract, excluding non-pecuniary claims and non-contractual claims. From art. 3 para. 1 of the Uniform Methods of Registration<sup>16</sup> and art. 8 of the Provisional Measures on Factoring, the conclusion can be drawn that China recognizes basically all kinds of monetary claims arising from contracts. This includes, in particular, those from sale of goods and provision of services, as well as monetary claims or proceeds arising from the lease of facilities as the object of a factoring contract. Moreover, the supplier can only be an enterprise and not a natural person.<sup>17</sup>
- 14 It used to be debated whether future receivables could be included in the scope of a factoring contract. On the one hand, previous provisions explicitly prohibited the assignment of future receivables for factoring purposes.<sup>18</sup> However, on the other hand, such transactions were not uncommon in practice.<sup>19</sup> Through art. 761 CCC, China has finally allowed future claims for factoring contracts to be transferable. This decision was made based on the developing trends of relevant international conventions and other major civil law jurisdictions, such as Germany and Japan.<sup>20</sup> The assignability of future claims is an indispensable requirement for revolving factoring and pool factoring, where future receivables arising in a certain period of time are assigned through a lump sum agreement to the factor.

Yet, art. 761 CCC does not deal with the time at which the assignment of future receivables takes effect. It is important to identify the priority of the creditors, particularly in the case of bankruptcy of the debtor and a court attachment on the accounts receivable. One suggestion is to grant the registration the effect of perfection, which means that, upon registration of the assignment, the factor can hold his right in the future receivables against a third party who has no registered right in the same receivables.<sup>21</sup> However, with this solution, the issue of when the assignment takes effect is left unsettled. Another opinion believes that the assignment takes effect as soon as the future claim comes into existence and is automatically acquired by the supplier.<sup>22</sup>

Another question that may be raised involves the separation of future claims and fabricated claims. This may render the factoring contract invalid, as future claims may never come into existence in actuality. One scholar believes that the assignment of future receivables is valid as long as the future claim can be identified (特定化) when it comes into existence, even if the individualization is unavailable at the time of assignment.<sup>23</sup> Future claims can be divided into two types: those with a concrete underlying relationship, and those without a concrete underlying relationship. Although the latter is more speculative, it is not a fabricated claim as long as it is foreseeable and identifiable.<sup>24</sup> However, the determination of this still requires further concretization by the judiciary. A commentator suggests that assignable future receivables should include those receivables that lack a concrete underlying relationship, if, based on the counterparty, subject matter, nature of the contract, and transaction history, they are highly likely to arise in the future.<sup>25</sup>

c) Market Access Limitation. Currently, factoring businesses are subject to supervision by the CBRC and can be conducted only by commercial banks and factoring companies (supra at 1). However, there are no uniform nationwide rules regarding market access. Some local regulations were issued by provincial governments in 2019 and later. In judicial practice, the effect of restricting access to the validity of factoring contracts has not yet become a prominent question, and corresponding judicial cases are still rare.

Art. 761 CCC does not touch upon the entry requirements of the factor and leaves this to be governed by the general rules on validity of contract in violation of mandatory provisions (supra Chap. 5 at 25). One opinion suggests that a factoring contract should be valid even if the market access qualification has not been granted. Another opinion holds that a factoring contract should be valid despite the lack of market access if it is a single transaction. However, they hold that if the factor lacking market access consistently offers factoring services, then all factoring contracts concluded by him should be invalid.<sup>26</sup>

2. Types

- 19 a) Recourse and nonrecourse factoring. The distinction between recourse factoring and nonrecourse factoring is codified by art. 766 and 767 CCC respectively, which mainly restate existing provisions. The majority of factoring businesses in China carry out recourse factoring, which is different from other countries.<sup>27</sup> Recourse factoring is defined in art. 766 CCC as a type of factoring where the factor provides financial services, but lacks the obligation to provide a guaranty for bad debts. Art. 766 CCC stipulates that the factor of a recourse factoring may choose to request payment from either the supplier or the debtor. This is in line with the majority of court judgements that were previously decided on recourse factoring. These ruled that, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the factor has the right to choose whom he first proceeds against, and he also has the right to claim from both the supplier and the debtor of the receivable, but cannot be paid repeatedly.<sup>28</sup> This means that art. 766 CCC has finally accepted the doctrine of security assignment (让与担保说) and rejected the doctrine of indirect payment (间接支付说) with regards to the relationship between the factor, the supplier and the debtor.<sup>29</sup>
- 20 Under the doctrine of security assignment, a recourse factor has the right to, although is under no obligation to, first request that the debtor pays the receivable. This is the case even if it is agreed upon in the factoring contract that “the payment of accounts receivable is the first source of repayment of factored financing”, because such an agreement is simply a hackneyed phrase in factoring business.<sup>30</sup> In contrast to the general assignment of claims, a recourse factor does not have full interest in the receivable, and is obliged to return the remaining factored balance to the supplier after recovering the receivable and deducting its financing principal and interest and related expenses. This reflects the high-level of security it offers. The factor of recourse factoring is allowed to sue both the debtor and the supplier in one suit.<sup>31</sup> A supplier that has returned the principle and interests to the factor, or has bought back the receivable, is entitled to request the debtor to pay the receivable.<sup>32</sup>
- 21 In a nonrecourse factoring contract, the factor provides funds to the supplier and manages the account or collects the receivable from the debtor as a new creditor. Any profits or losses incurred by the factor in enforcing the claim is borne by itself. Since the supplier transfers most of the risk to the factor, the factor is bound to charge a higher factoring fee, and the part of the factor's proceeds that exceeds the principal and interest of the financing funds and related fees need not be returned to the supplier.
- 22 It is worth noting that the guaranty of a nonrecourse factor for the debtor's credit risk only includes credit failure, financial inability and non-willingness to pay. It does not cover the risk of dispute situation, creditor fraud, force majeure, changes in the underlying transaction contract, the debtor's defense based on the underlying transaction contract, the right of set-off, and the right to termination.<sup>33</sup> Therefore, in the case of the materialization of these risks, the factor is entitled to request that the supplier repurchases the receivables or assumes liability for the breach of contract.

b) Disclosed Factoring and Undisclosed Factoring. Disclosed factoring (公开型保理；明保理) refers to factoring where the factor sends the debtor a notice of assignment, advises the debtor about the factoring relationship and notifies them to remit payments to the factor. Conversely, no notice of assignment is sent to the debtor in an undisclosed factoring agreement (隐蔽型保理；暗保理). This is consequently favored by the supplier, who wants to retain a cooperative relationship with the debtor.

However, this advantage may be offset by the inability of the factor to “perfect” the acquired receivable to secure their priority right. Only the factor is eligible for registration, and this is, by nature, unavailable in undisclosed factoring. In the case of multiple assignments, the undisclosed factor may get a share of the receivable, but only if other factors neither registered the assignment nor sent a notice of assignment (infra at 51).

c) Other Types. The Glossary “Commercial Factoring Terminology: Basic Terminology”,<sup>34</sup> published by the Chinese Commercial Factoring Expertise Committee, compiles a number of other factoring types with brief explanations. This includes domestic and international factoring, import and export factoring, single-factor factoring and two-factors factoring, advanced factoring and maturity factoring and so on. However, this topic will not be discussed further in this chapter.

3. Written Requirement and Major Contents

Art. 762 para. 2 CCC sets out that a factoring contract must be in writing. Art. 762 para. 1 CCC further enumerates typical contents of a factoring contract, which include the business type, scope of service, term of service, information on the underlying transaction contract and the accounts receivable, financing funds through factoring, service remuneration and methods of payment thereof. This provision is clearly dispositive.

1. Legal Effect

One issue that frequently arises, but has not been codified, is the situation where a contract clause prohibits the supplier from assigning a receivable. Is it still possible for the factor to recover from the debtor? The answer to this question can be found in art. 545 CCC, which provides “where the parties agree that a non-pecuniary claim may not be assigned, such an agreement may not be asserted against a bona fide third person. Where the parties agree that a pecuniary claim may not be assigned, such an agreement may not be asserted against a third person.” This provision distinguishes between pecuniary and non-pecuniary claims and stipulates different legal consequences for the anti-assignment clause on this basis. In the case of monetary claims, such an agreement is absolutely ineffective against third parties. This means the assignment of a receivable is valid even if the third party (i.e. the factor) knows of the existence of the anti-assignment clause.

It can be inferred from art. 545 CCC that an anti-assignment agreement is valid between the parties, meaning the supplier is liable to the debtor for damage, if the supplier assigns a receivable against an anti-assignment agreement. Such damage could take the form of additional fulfillment costs incurred by the debtor. In such a case, the debtor may offset these costs with the claim assigned to the factor.

2. Subsequent Assignments

- 29 Following this, we must consider whether the bar on assignment impacts the validity of a subsequent assignment of the same receivable, for example to another factor. One commentator suggests borrowing the solution found in art. 9 para. 1 of the Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade, which states that an anti-assignment agreement has no impact on a subsequent assignment made in breach of the terms of the factoring contract.<sup>35</sup> This opinion is backed by the wording of art. 545 CCC.

3. Conflict with Reservation of Title

- 30 It is possible that conflict may arise if the supplier's receivable, in order to secure payment for the product sold under reservation of title, has already been attached with a pledge in favor of a seller. In this case, both the factor and the seller have rights in the same receivable, so it is necessary to determine the priority of the two parties. So far, there have been no relevant disputes in mainland China, as reservation of title is rarely used in practice. However, conflict between factoring, pledge and assignment of the same receivable is also possible. This is governed by analogous application of art. 766 CCC, meaning that the time of registration determines the priority of the competing rights (infra at 51).<sup>36</sup>

IV. Factoring Fraud

- 31 In China, factoring frauds are quite prevalent and amount to the greatest risk in the factoring sector. Particularly prevalent are “false underlying transactions”, which pertains to the fabrication of non-existent receivables by the supplier and the debtor.<sup>37</sup> Art. 763 CCC was codified to address this, setting out that in such a case the debtor of the fabricated receivable may not assert a defense against the factor on the ground that the account receivable does not exist, unless the factor clearly knows of such a fabrication. In the literature, both the prerequisites for, and the necessity of, this provision are subject to intense debate. Apart from that, in order to invoke art. 763 CCC, the debtor has to prove that the underlying transaction does not exist and that the factor has actual or constructive knowledge of this.

1. Prerequisites

- 32 a) Fabrication of an Account Receivable. Fabrication of a receivable refers to the creation of an appearance of a receivable that does not actually exist.<sup>38</sup> Due to the broad wording of art. 763 CCC and its legislative history, it can be assumed that deliberate cooperation between the supplier and the debtor is not required.<sup>39</sup> In most cases fabrication of a receivable involves conspiracy between the supplier and the debtor, however, their separate acts without conspiracy may still constitute fabrication of a receivable in the sense of art. 763 CCC. A typical scenario is where the debtor makes a written confirmation of the receivable upon receipt of the transfer notice sent by the supplier.<sup>40</sup> However, if the supplier fabricates the receivable unilaterally and the debtor remains silent upon receipt of the transfer notice sent by the factor, this cannot be considered a fabrication by the supplier and the debtor. The debtor does not have an obligation to inform the factor of his rejection of the claim. Thus, in this situation, the defense of nonexistence of the receivable remains available to the debtor.<sup>41</sup> The signing of the receipt certifying that the notice of assignment is received is not considered confirmation of the content of the notice, i.e., of the receivable.<sup>42</sup>

b) Actual or Constructive Knowledge. According to art. 763 CCC, only actual knowledge of the factor may exclude him from asserting a defense against the fabrication of a non-existing receivable. Also, a consensus appears to have been reached among commentators that constructive knowledge of the factor should also fall within the scope of art. 763 CCC.<sup>43</sup> The reasoning is rather straightforward: if constructive knowledge were insufficient to trigger the application of art. 763 CCC, the factor would have no incentive to investigate the authenticity of the account receivable or to reduce the risks of factoring fraud. In this respect, a parallel can be drawn with art. 613 CCC, which bars the buyer from asserting warranty claims if he knew, or should have known, of the defect of title.

The scope of an investigation obligation, if such an obligation can be assumed, is more controversial. Art. 7 of the Provisional Measures on Factoring explicitly stipulates that the factor has the obligation to review the authenticity of the underlying transaction and “ensure that initial ownership of the accounts receivable is clear and determined, the certificate(s) of previous transfer(s) are complete and there is no dispute over responsibilities”. The model factoring agreement drafted by the Commercial Factoring Expertise Committee also includes the obligation of the supplier to submit the original documents, such as the contract, invoice, and delivery certificate, to be reviewed by the factor. One commentator believes that this investigatory obligation is comprehensive, since in most cases factoring contracts involve ordinary debts that are not securitized.<sup>44</sup> For this reason, if a fabricated claim is reassigned to another factor, the assignee can be protected by art. 763 CCC only if he has discharged the obligation of investigation.<sup>45</sup> The scholarly opinion believes that, in the case of reassignment to another factor, the assignee deserves protection even if he has knowledge of the fabrication. This assumes that the flaw of the receivable has been purged by the first assignment<sup>46</sup> and fails to explain the reasoning for this conclusion, which deviates from the general rule that bona fide acquisition is unavailable for ordinary debts.

Another commentator believes that the standard of investigation imposed upon the factor should not be too high. The investigation should be formal, but based on the standard of an ordinary person lacking relevant expertise. They also hold that only the original contract and the confirmation of the receivable should be subject to review.<sup>47</sup> However, this view is less differentiated and balanced, therefore failing to create incentives for the factors to prevent financial risks. It should thus be rejected.
